Social Care Assessments and Support Plan

The role of Adult Social Care is to help people maintain or regain their independence regardless of age, disability or personal circumstances in ways that allow people choice and control over how they live their lives.

The aim of a Social Care Assessment

Social Care assessment and support planning should be an integrated process to identify and address the needs of individuals. It is important for practitioners to recognise that need relates to the unique, individual requirements of a person to achieve, maintain or regain an acceptable level of social independence or quality of life and that support should be personalised rather than generic.

The assessment considers what type of services you need, and will relate to your unique, individual requirements, to help you achieve, maintain or regain an acceptable level of social independence or quality of life.

Even if a person is diagnosed with exactly the same condition or disability as someone else, what that means for those two people can be very different. Care assessments can vary, depending on your particular needs. However, the assessment should at least provide basic information, and a care plan should be drawn up so that you know what to do and what’s happening as a result of the assessment.

The local authority is obliged to carry out a care assessment when they become aware that someone may be in need of community care services. This may mean that an assessment is offered even if have not specifically requested one.

Alternatively, you can contact the local social services department and ask them to arrange a care assessment.

Where there are disputes about the process of the assessment or the care plan, there are ways that decisions can be challenged or you can make a complaint.

The Support Plan developed should be a person centred document, giving an individualised picture of the service user.

Carers

A carer is anyone who looks after a family member, friend or partner, who due to illness, disability, mental health problem or addiction cannot cope without their support. They do not get paid.

If you have a carer, they can take part in your care and support planning if you want them to. They know you well and and any care and support should be organised in a way that fits with any support they already provide.

Caring for someone can also affect a carer’s own life and health. If a carer feels that they need support themselves, social services can carry out a carer’s assessment and develop a carer’s support plan.

Some people’s family members or friends may choose not to provide care and that’s ok. Some people may not have family or friends to support them. Both these things should be noted and thought about as part of the care and support planning discussion.

Carer’s assessment

Carer’s are entitled to a Carer’s assessment in their own right, this should be focused on the carer’s needs. Where there is a conflict in terms of the proposed outcome to meet service user/ carer needs the service user must not be compromised and an acceptable solution for both parties be sought.

Where an assessment considers both the service user and their carer’s situation at the same time, this is regarded as a joint assessment and should be identified as such.
